OVERCOMING OBJECTIONS

Most people disregard objections, but it's just as important t know how to handle objections as it is to know how to land meetings in the first place.

I
A

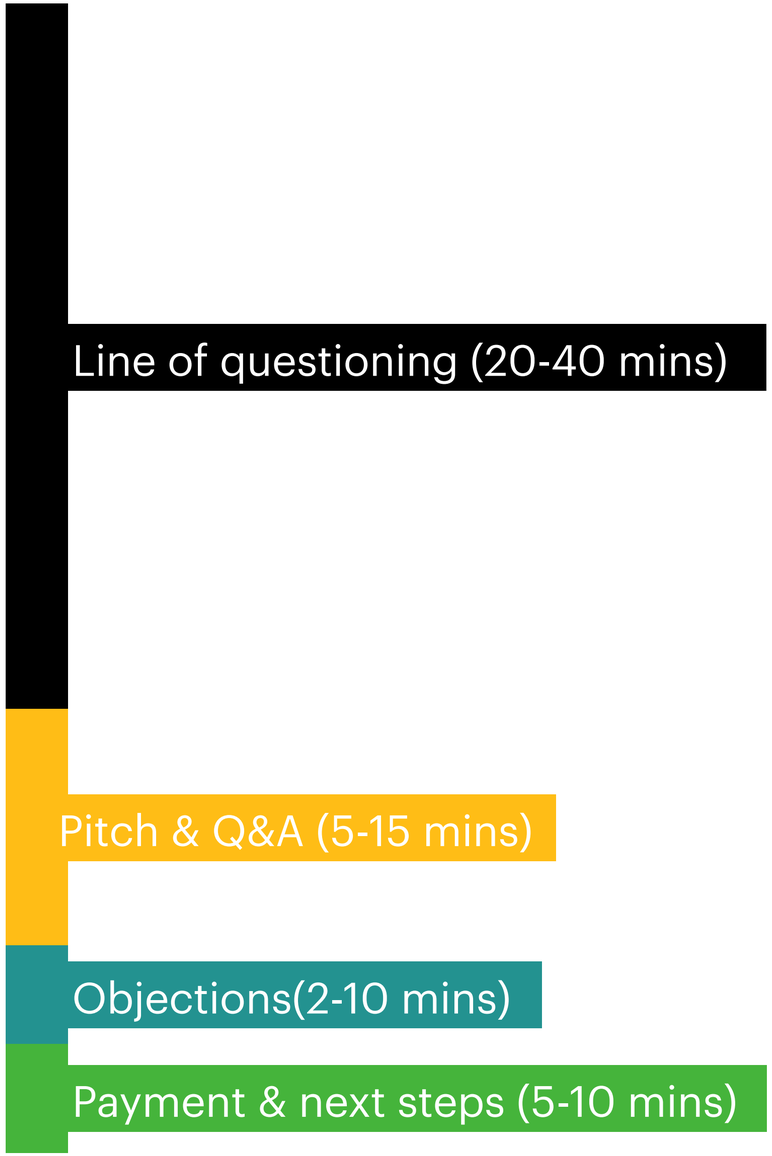

The sale truly does not start until the first objection is raised

The irony is that the objection handling phase is one of the shortest phases in the sales call

I
A

I

Line of questioning (20-40 mins)
Pitch & Q&A (5-15 mins)
Objections(2-10 mins)
Payment & next steps (5-10 mins)

I
A

Observe: the all you have to do to get to the payment is ‘get through’ the objection stage. It’s often far shorter and much less scary than you may think it is.

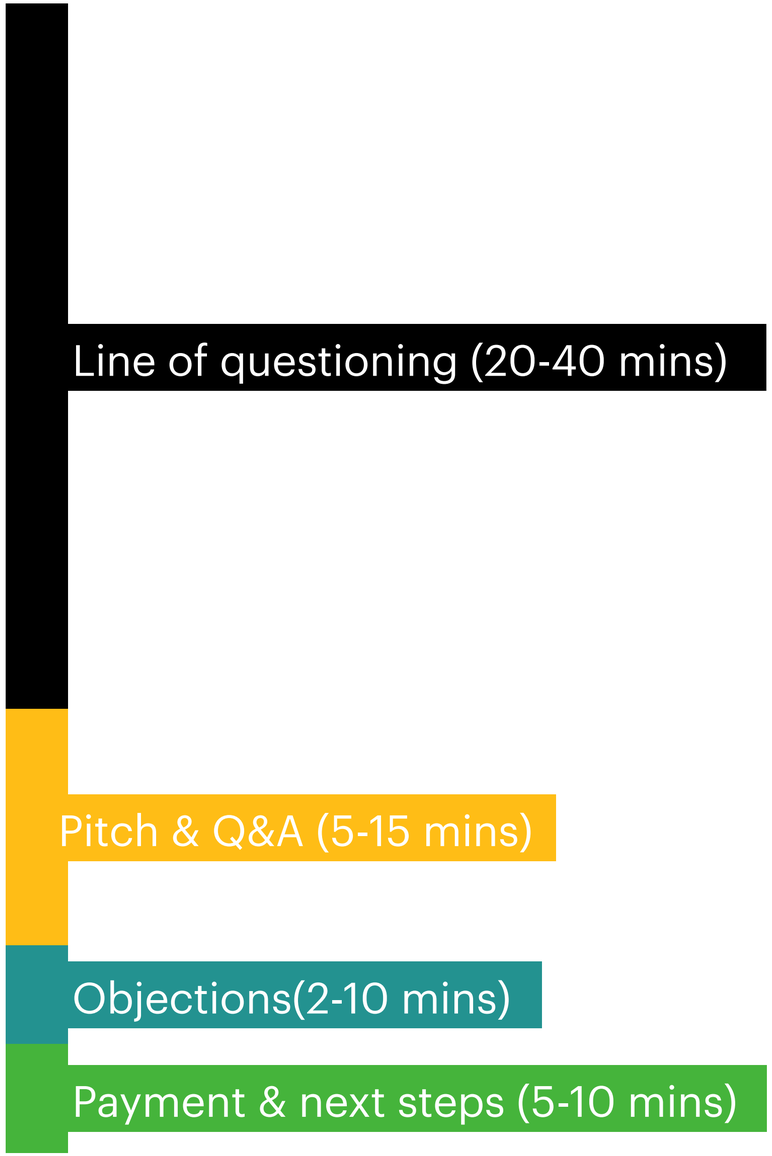

I
A

As with everything in business, the reason you'll struggle to handle objections is because of the beliefs you have that surround them. Most people's objection related beliefs create fear and stop them from trying to overcome objections.

The Objection Epiphany

The objection handling phase is most commonly the shortest phase of the call. When most people encounter an objection, they freak out or get all ‘agreeable’ on the prospect, afraid of causing conflict or afraid of harming the chance of a close.

Simply put, a lot of agency owners would rather give the prospect ‘time to think about it’ or ‘time to talk to their spouse’ because they are afraid.

On paper, handling objections is easy. You have your rebuttals, you have the frameworks

I
A

But in reality, when most agency owners go to handle objections, they find it extremely hard

I
A

Why?

I
A

Fear.

Get this through your mind: If you are not regularly overcoming objections, it’s because you are afraid

I

Fear of what?

You probably can’t define this yourself as the brain has a pretty clever way of concealing our fears so we aren’t empowered to face them

I
A

There are 3 objection related fears that plague the existence of all salespeople

I
A

1) Fear of conflict

2) Fear of what the prospect will think about you

3) Fear of losing the sale / rejection

I
A

Most agency owners don’t even try to overcome an objection

I
A

Most agency owners are agreeable and lack that ‘killer instinct’ required to get the sale over the line and closed

I

Let’s break down these fears

I
A

If you recognise one of them in yourself you must force yourself to overcome it, or you'll never overcome objections

I
A

3 Fears That Prevent Objection Conquering

- If you are afraid of handling an objection, no technique or rebuttal we provide will save you. Most salespeople are ruled by the fear of what might happen if they try to handle the objection, so they either don't try or try half heartedly then roll over because their brain has convinced them 'it's the right thing to do'.

- Well, it isn't. The right thing to do when an objection is raised is not to roll over in a fit of agreeableness, it's to fucking demolish it. Simply put, if you aren't making an effort to handle objections and get your deals closed, it's because you're afraid. Of one, or all, of the following...

Fear 1 : Conflict

1. Fear of conflict: Most humans are scared of conflict. They live their lives in an agreeable state, whereby they don't challenge anyone, speak their mind or tell others what they really want. So, when they try sales, it's common they fear conflict because they want their prospect to like them and you don't want to 'break rapport'. They're afraid of what might happen if they challenge the prospect and you don't want 'any trouble' on the call.

Fear of conflict just derives from a deep rooted fear of upsetting others. This is usually because the person with the fear is easily upset. Simply put, you don't want to upset others because you yourself hate being upset or challenged, so you just don't challenge anyone because you don't want them to be upset.

Examples: "I don't want to upset him" | "I don't want to offend him" | "He's entitled to that opinion and it would be rude for me to challenge it" | "I don't want to cause an argument" | "If I say that it'll just piss him off" | "I don't want to pressure anyone" | "Who am I to tell a successful business owner they are wrong?"

I
A

Fear 1 : Conflict

Understand: this is totally bonkers to fear if you are genuinely in a position to help your prospect. Because if you don't overcome their objection, they are going to be upset that they don't have what you can give them. They are upset with their current situation, so why would you let a fear of upsetting them stand in the way of closing them making them the happiest person alive with your services?

Likewise, maybe you don't want to cause conflict because you're afraid of being upset yourself. Well, what's going to cause more conflict in your life, challenging objections so you can help people achieve their dreams, or having no clients?

Conflict is an inevitability in business. You either face it on the call or you face it in your mind when you're broke & starting at the ceiling with no money to pay rent & contemplating getting a 9-5 job at 3AM.

Besides, the way we teach objection handling is such that we avoid riling up the prospects ego, so you're never going to encounter out right shouting matches or aggressive prospects!

I

Fear 2 : What the Prospect will think of you

1. Fear of what they'll think: Most people think they are what others think they are. This is not true, but they don't realise this, so they avoid challenging objections because they don't want the prospect to judge them or think badly of them. They believe the key to making the sale happen is to get the prospect to like them and to befriend the prospect and will do everything to keep this friendship and rapport. You must realise that we are on a sales call to get clients, not friends. While it's true that people buy from people who they like (you want to be likeable), you can't let the fear of someone not liking you get in the way of you ruthlessly closing a deal.

Fear 2 : What the Prospect will think of you

Understand: If you are good at handling objections and actually try, the prospect will admire you and will think you are a respectable business owner with a flare for sales. They won't think you're a slimy salesperson with an ulterior motive.

If you challenge an objection with the prospects best interest at heart, they will realise this and will come to like you more for it. Let go of the idea that people's opinions matter. If the prospect wants to think you're a asshole for challenging their opinion and doesn't buy because of this, realise that you dodged a bullet as they would be a terrible client to deal with anyway.

It's inevitable that in sales we are going to piss some people off. I say let them be pissed off. It's on them, not us. Don't let your fear of not being liked stand in the way of closing a sale.

Examples: "I don't want him to judge me" | "I'd better not say anything, it'll just make him dislike me" | | "I don't want to break this rapport" | "I want him to like me" | "If I'm nice, it'll improve my chance of making the sale" |

Fear 3 : Losing the sale

1. Fear of losing the sale: Most people are terrified of losing the sale because they are in a scarcity mindset. They cherish every call and don't want to do anything that might hurt it's ability to close. So, when it gets to the objection handling phase of the call, they roll over and let the prospect walk all over them, as they've convinced themselves that challenging the prospect will cause them to say no. They'd rather live in denial with the comfort of a 'maybe' than face the healthy painful truth of a 'no'.

I
A

Fear 3 : Losing the sale

There will be times when, no matter how hard you try, you cannot overcome an objection. When this happens, you and the prospect will conclude that it's a no. To the untrained salesperson, this causes pain. Most agency owners would rather avoid the pain and just say 'awesome, well get back to me soon", to take comfort in the fact that the prospect might buy in the future. Simply put, they are building a business on hope. Hope is a no strategy for growth.

Understand: you are responsible for overcoming the objection. If you do not handle the objection on the call, it will never be handled. Prospects do not handle their own objections. So, if you are truly afraid of losing the sale, you'll do everything you can to handle the objection on the call and get the call closed there and then.

Examples: "I'll let them make their own mind up" | "I don't want to piss them off and lose the chance to make the sale" | "I'd rather give them time to make an educated decision" | "I'll lose the sale if I fight back" | "If I try too hard the prospect won't buy. I'll let them come to me" | "If I let him think about it, he'll owe me one"

I
A

How do we remedy these fears?

Remedy your irrational fear

- The first step to remedying a fear of objection handling is to recognise that it exists and actually analyse it. If you are afraid of the potential conflict caused by you challenging an objection, pause this video to actually analyse that fear and why it exists and you'll quickly come to the conclusion that it's total bullshit and isn't grounded in reality or the truth. Likewise with fear of what they'll think about you or fear of losing the sale, take a long hard look at why that fear exists and watch it shatter before your eyes.

- The truth is that when you challenge someones objection properly you will:

1) Put a fire of 'conflict' out, not add fuel to it
2) Gain respect from the prospect and bring them around to a more accurate understanding of the truth
3) Win the sale, or at least increase your chances of winning it

I

Remedy your irrational fear

- Conflict: know that if things really got out of hand, you can just hang up the phone or end the meeting abruptly. I've never had to do this, but it's always given me peace of mind to know that if things really went south, the door is always open for me to leave.

- Judgement: know that it's better to be seen as a fearless & bold closer with a persuasive flair than someone who's whole life is ruled by their fear of what others might think of them.

- Losing the sale: know that the easiest way to lose a sale is to ignore objections. The best time to close a deal is now, and if you let them off the hook on the first call, they're never coming back.

A

Finally, understand this...

I
A

Your prospect is EXPECTING a rebuttal

In fact, they’re probably hoping you can overcome their objection

I
A

Because deep down, they want you to solve their problem and they want you to make the pain go away

I
A

They know they have a problem and they know you can probably solve it, they just want to put their mind at rest and be certain it’s the right thing to do

I
A

So don’t be afraid! Objections are awesome. We should learn to love them

I
A

If they didn’t exist, we’d never have the opportunity to explore the prospects uncertainties and close the deal

I
A

Also note that if someone has raised an objection, they haven’t yet decided what they are going to do

I
A

So capitalise on this chance and get them closed

If you do your job properly, handling objections will be very easy and you won’t struggle to get them closed

I
A

However, if you do the call right, you may not even have to handle objections...

I

Erasmian Philosophy

This is Desiderius Erasmus. He came up with a pretty clever quote and we're going to use it to underpin our entire objection handling framework.

In other words, it's much better to prevent something bad from happening than having to fix it when it does.

In sales, it's far better to counter an objection before the prospect actually has chance to raise it.

After a while, you'll start to notice a pattern with your prospects' objections

That is, the same objections will keep appearing again and again

Introduction

This form may be the most valuable thing you have and use in your career as a sales professional. Use this to log feedback on your script and make a monthly habit of reviewing what is on the form and make changes to your script accordingly. Print it out and complete it for your next 30 calls, then make adjustments and do it again.

SCRIPT VERSION: (V .0)

1. 30 Calls

Start by crossing off the numbers as you go. It's going to take 30 calls to complete this form, so make sure you actually do 30 calls with the exact script and make adjustments as necessary at the end. Don't get emotional or make changes beforehand. You must make 30 full calls before judging your script.

I
A

Once you notice these recurring objections, you can sew ‘pre-close rebuttals’ into your pitch

I
A

Also, as you move through your line of questioning you will be able to anticipate potential objections

I
A

So if you ask “What are you currently doing to get customers” and they say “Facebook ads, but the lead quality is rubbish”

I
A

Then you would make a temporary adjustment to your pitch to mention how solid the lead quality is

I
A

Because if you don’t, you can be sure that the prospect will object to lead quality as soon as they find out you use Facebook ads

I
A

And it makes total sense that they would - all they've ever known is bad leads from Facebook, so of course they're going to object to using FB to advertise

I

Befriending Objections

The way you approach a problem will determine how easily you solve it

I
A

Objections are simply a lack of confidence, articulated as a problem

I
A

If you approach them in a negative frame, you'll completely blow your chances of overcoming them

I

Next time someone objects, observe your natural reaction… It’ll probably be negative

I
A

It’s imperative that you learn to love objections; without them we wouldn’t be able to close the deal!

I
A

When you reply to an objection with ‘I’m so glad you brought that up’ or ‘What a great point’ and genuinely mean it, you’ll take all the momentum out of it and bring it to a halt

I

Befriending Objections

- You must condition yourself to welcome objections with open arms and enjoy dealing with them - as soon as you resent them, they'll be 10x harder to solve

- Your sense of 'enjoyment' will radiate across as confidence in the prospect, further quashing the doubt and suffocating the objection in the process.

- Every objection should be met with something like "I'm so glad you brought that up" or "That's an excellent point", followed by something like "But you've no reason to concern yourself with it because..." or "and here's why it's not worth worrying about..."

- Here's an image to help you understand: The family dog - always happy to see you no matter what. Even if you're in a bad mood, the dogs enthusiastic positive attitude never fails to cheer you up. You must be the same - meet hostile objections like a dog seeing its owner for the first time in 6 months and watch them wither before you.

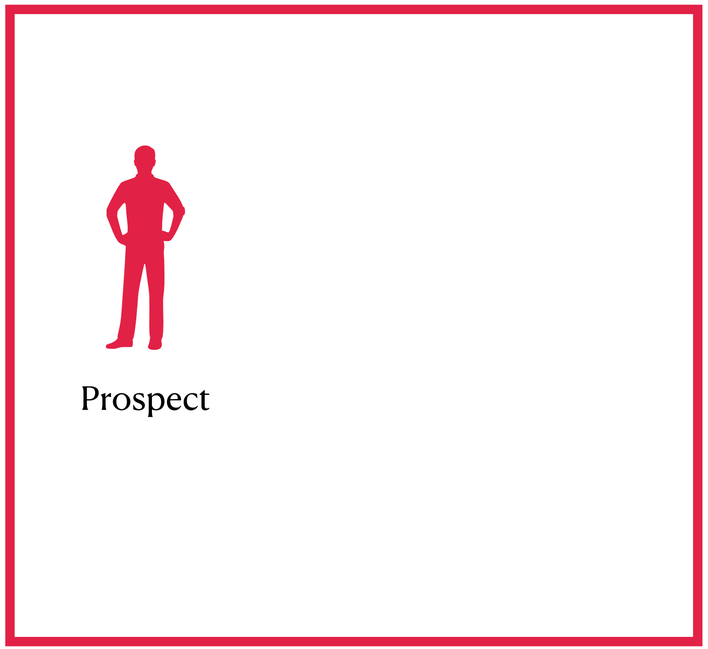

- (Quick warning: you should still maintain a calm and collected attitude - don't mistake enthusiasm of confidence for neuroticism!)

I
A

I call this...

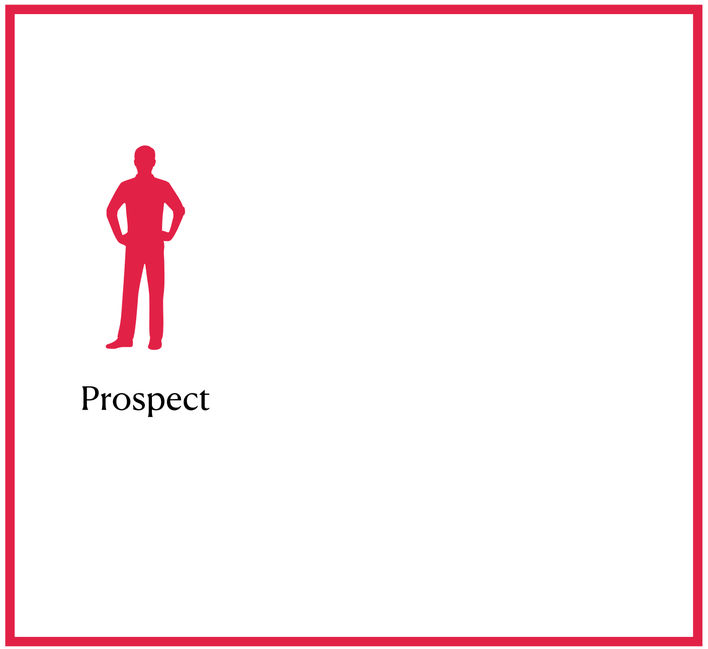

Breaking Frames

Objection, Negative Frame

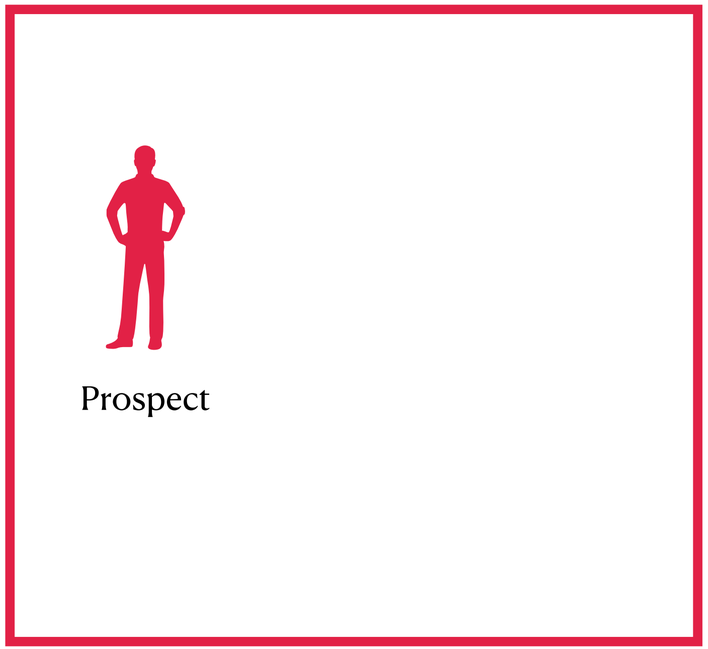

I

Objection, Negative Frame

When a prospect raises an objection, it is typically in a ‘negative frame’. By negative, I mean they think that what they are saying is going to prevent the sale from happening and that this is a reason the deal shouldn’t go forward.

I
A

Objection, Negative Frame

When a prospect raises an objection, it is typically in a ‘negative frame’. By negative, I mean they think that what they are saying is going to prevent the sale from happening and that this is a reason the deal shouldn’t go forward.

A prospects frame depends upon the emotional state they tie to it. Emotions are contagious, and if you’re not careful, you’ll get swept up in the prospects negative frame, meaning you both come to the conclusion that the deal shouldn’t go forward because of what the prospect has just raised.

Prospect

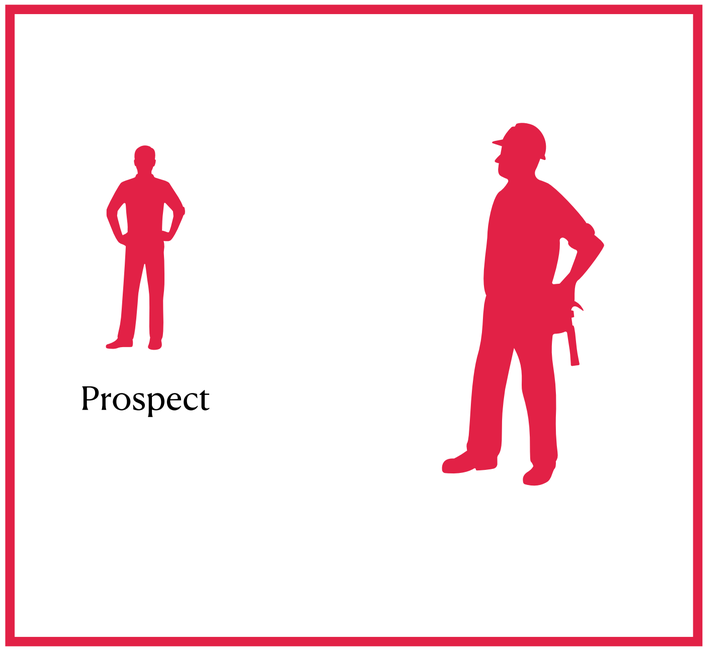

You

Objection, Negative Frame

I
A

At this point, you have two options...

Objection, Negative Frame

1) Join the prospect in their negative frame by approaching the objection in the same negative light that they did.

This builds doubt in the prospects mind and will stop the sale dead in its tracks.

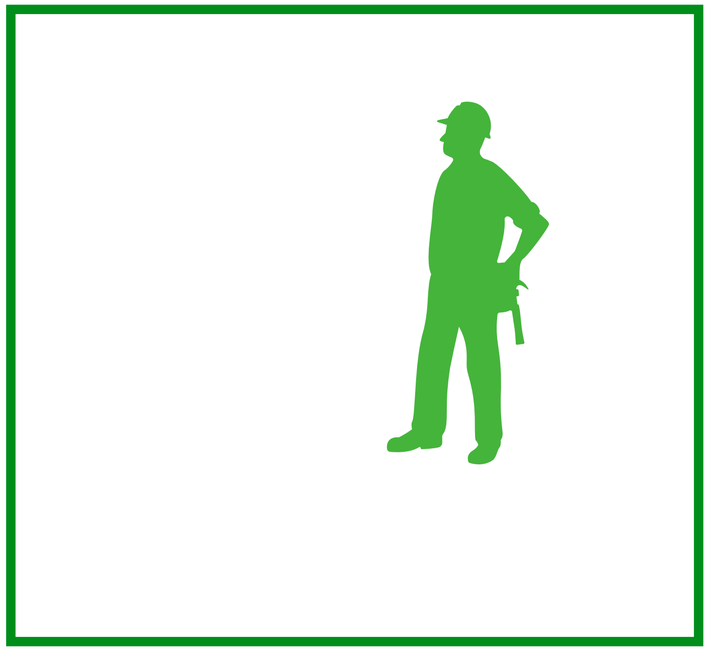

I
A

Or...

2) Enter the objection with a totally different frame, a positive one. Welcome the objection with open arms, then explain to the prospect why it's not going to stand in the way of the sale happening and why it's not a problem.

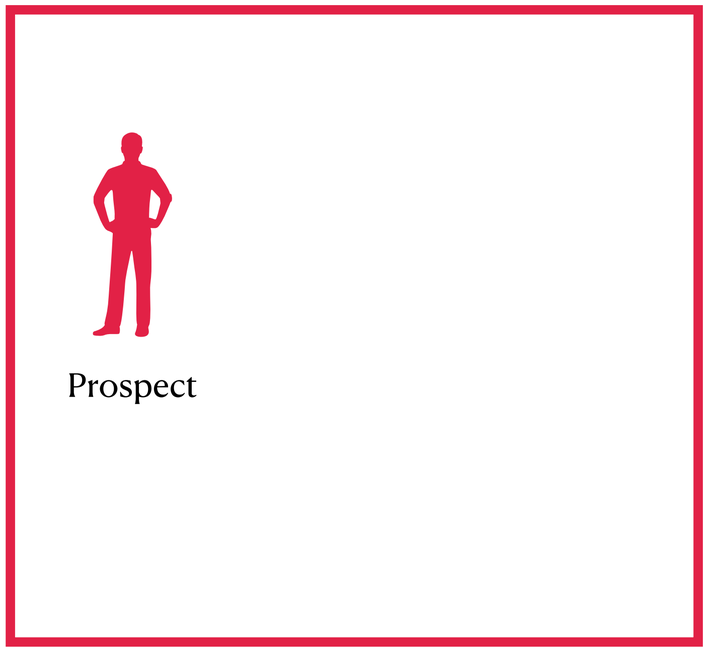

Objection, Negative Frame

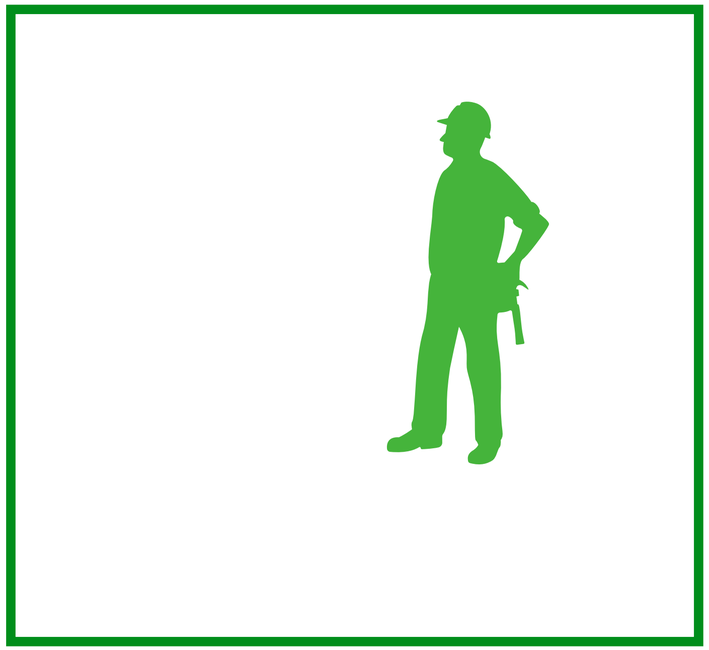

Rebuttal, Positive Frame

I

You do this by befriending objections, welcoming them and sounding genuinely happy when the prospect brings it up...

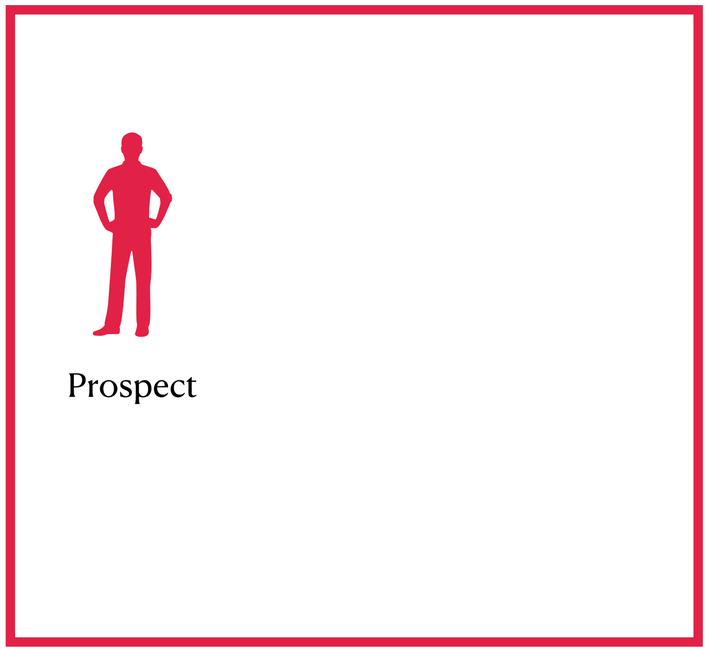

Objection, Negative Frame

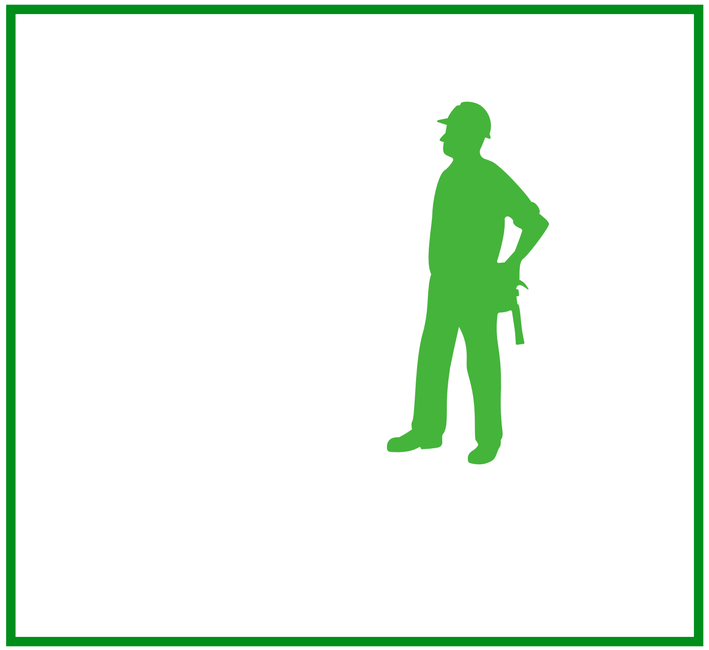

Rebuttal, Positive Frame

I

And here's what happens, if you do it properly...

Objection, Negative Frame

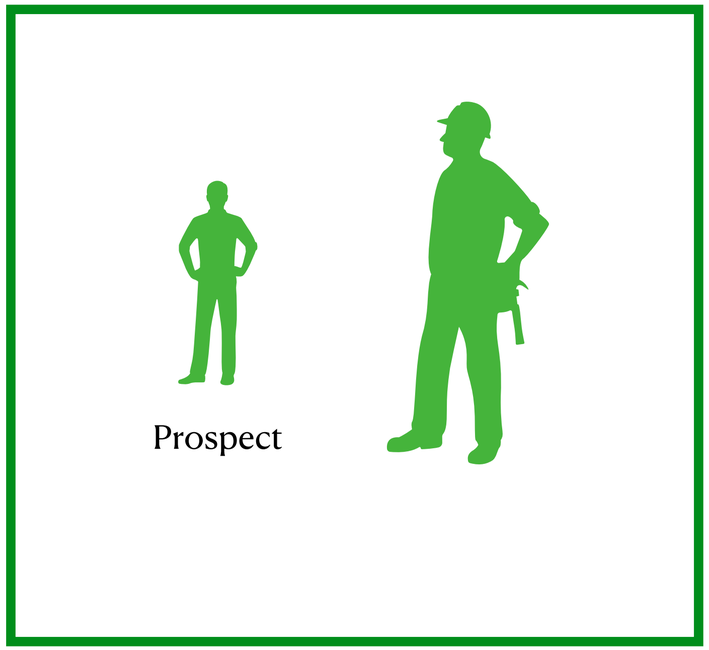

Rebuttal, Positive Frame

I
A

The prospect leaves the negative frame and enters your positive one. This raises their confidence and certainly in you and your product. All you have to do is do this for all their objections and BOOM, they're closed.

Objection, Negative Frame

Rebuttal, Positive Frame

I
A

“Place an extinguished piece of coal next to a live one, and either it will cause the other one to die or the live one will reignite the other one”

- Epictetus

I
A

Radical Empathy

Radical Empathy

- Empathy is an extremely powerful tool that all human beings (except sociopaths) have at their disposal.
- It's simple - when the prospect brings up an objection you must realise that there is a reason for doing so. If we can get to the reason, we can counter it and conquer it. The easiest way to dig out the reason is to practise genuine, real empathy and make a proper effort to understand and empathise with the prospect.
- Once you learn to do this, prospects will feel your genuine desire to understand them, and there is nothing more flattering than another person giving us their full attention really wanting to know where we're coming from.
- Just saying 'I totally understand where you're coming from' isn't enough - you need to mean what you say!

Aggression and hostility are poor tools for handling objections. Instead I prefer to leverage empathy, patience and understanding.

I
A

Belief Based Objections

Sometimes, objections are vehicles for faulty beliefs that prospects hold

I
A

These beliefs may not align with your methodology or offer and therefore cause objections

A prime example in the marketing agency space is “I don’t think Facebook ads will work for my business”

I
A

9.9/10, these beliefs will be wrong and it’s your job to correct them. If you don’t, you’ll lose the sale

I

To understand how to overcome these, refer to the ‘ego evading & belief breaking questions’ section of the ‘Imperium Sales Arsenal’

I
A

Weapon 8: Ego-Evasion & Belief Breaking questions

A lot of your sales calls will end in a no. This usually happens because the prospects beliefs aren't aligned with yours, or they don't believe that what you do will work for them. You may believe it, but getting them to believe it is quite a task. If you directly challenge their beliefs, their ego barrier will fly up and they'll never come down.

If you want someone to accept a belief that you have, the easiest way to do it is through intelligent questioning. Understand that the prospect will not listen to your ideas or advice until they've actually bought from you, so there is no point in trying to convince them of your way of thinking directly. If we are too direct with our approach and 'tell' the prospect what they should believe or think, we won't get anywhere.

Use questions that, by the prospect answering them, undermine their belief and shatter their paradigm around it.

E.g. In Imperium one common objection is 'I don't want a Program, I want done for you'...

"OK John, let me ask you a question about that. You've just told me on this call that appointment setting is the most important thing to achieving your goal of $40k per month and don't yet have the knowledge of how to do it. I understand you want to outsource this. Tell me how that's going to work for you?"

E.g. "Facebook Ads don't work for me"

"OK Claire, I get you, help me understand here. What specifically about Facebook ads doesn't work for your business?"

E.g "I don't trust marketing agencies"

We’ll cover this in more depth in the next video, but for now you just need to remember that people’s objections are commonly a manifestation of faulty beliefs

I
A

Confidence Looping

Confidence is key to overcoming objections

I

That’s because it eradicates doubt

Doubt is like ‘oxygen’ for an objection - without it, no objection can survive

I

We want to use a method called ‘Looping’ to increase confidence and remove doubt

After you conquer each objection, be sure to ‘loop’ it back to how you help them achieve their outcome

I
A

Looping is where we use an objection as an opportunity to introduce more certainty into the prospects mind

I
A

When they raise an objection, you should counter it and then end it with a statement like ‘so you can see why that’s never a problem’

I
A

After a few objections, if you do this right, the prospects confidence : doubt ratio will increase and they'll run out of 'objection oxygen'

I
A

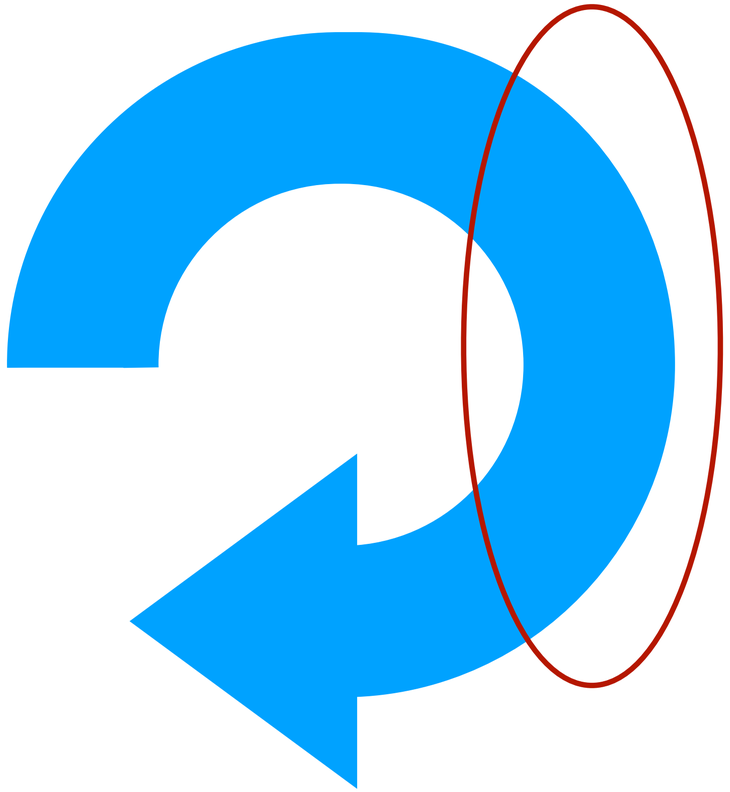

I
A

Prospect raises objection, has a 50:50 confidence : doubt
ratio

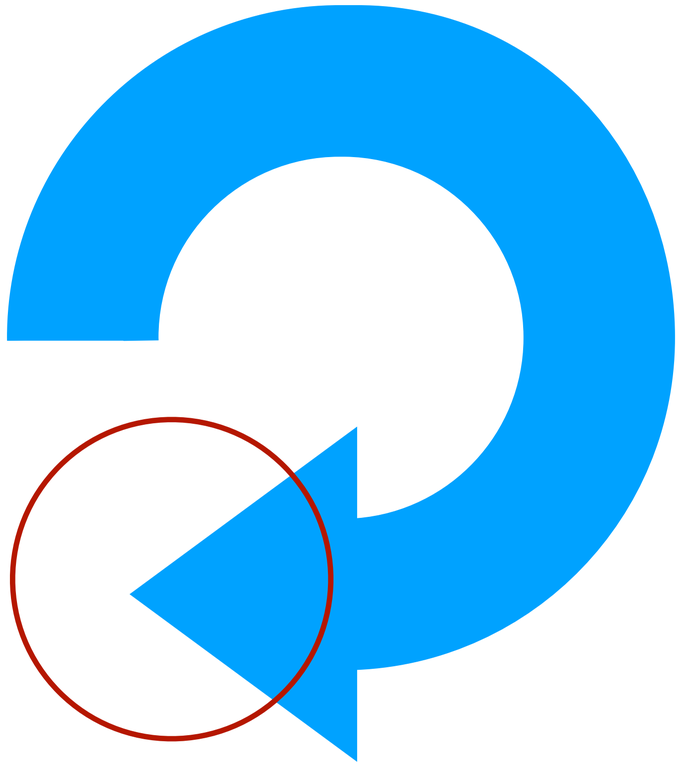

I
A

We conquer the objection, and use it as an opportunity to install more certainty in the prospect

I
A

Prospect now has a confidence : doubt ratio of 60 : 50

I

Confidence and certainty (AKA likelihood to close)

Time / Amount of Objections Conquered

I

I
A

Confidence and certainty (AKA likelihood to close)

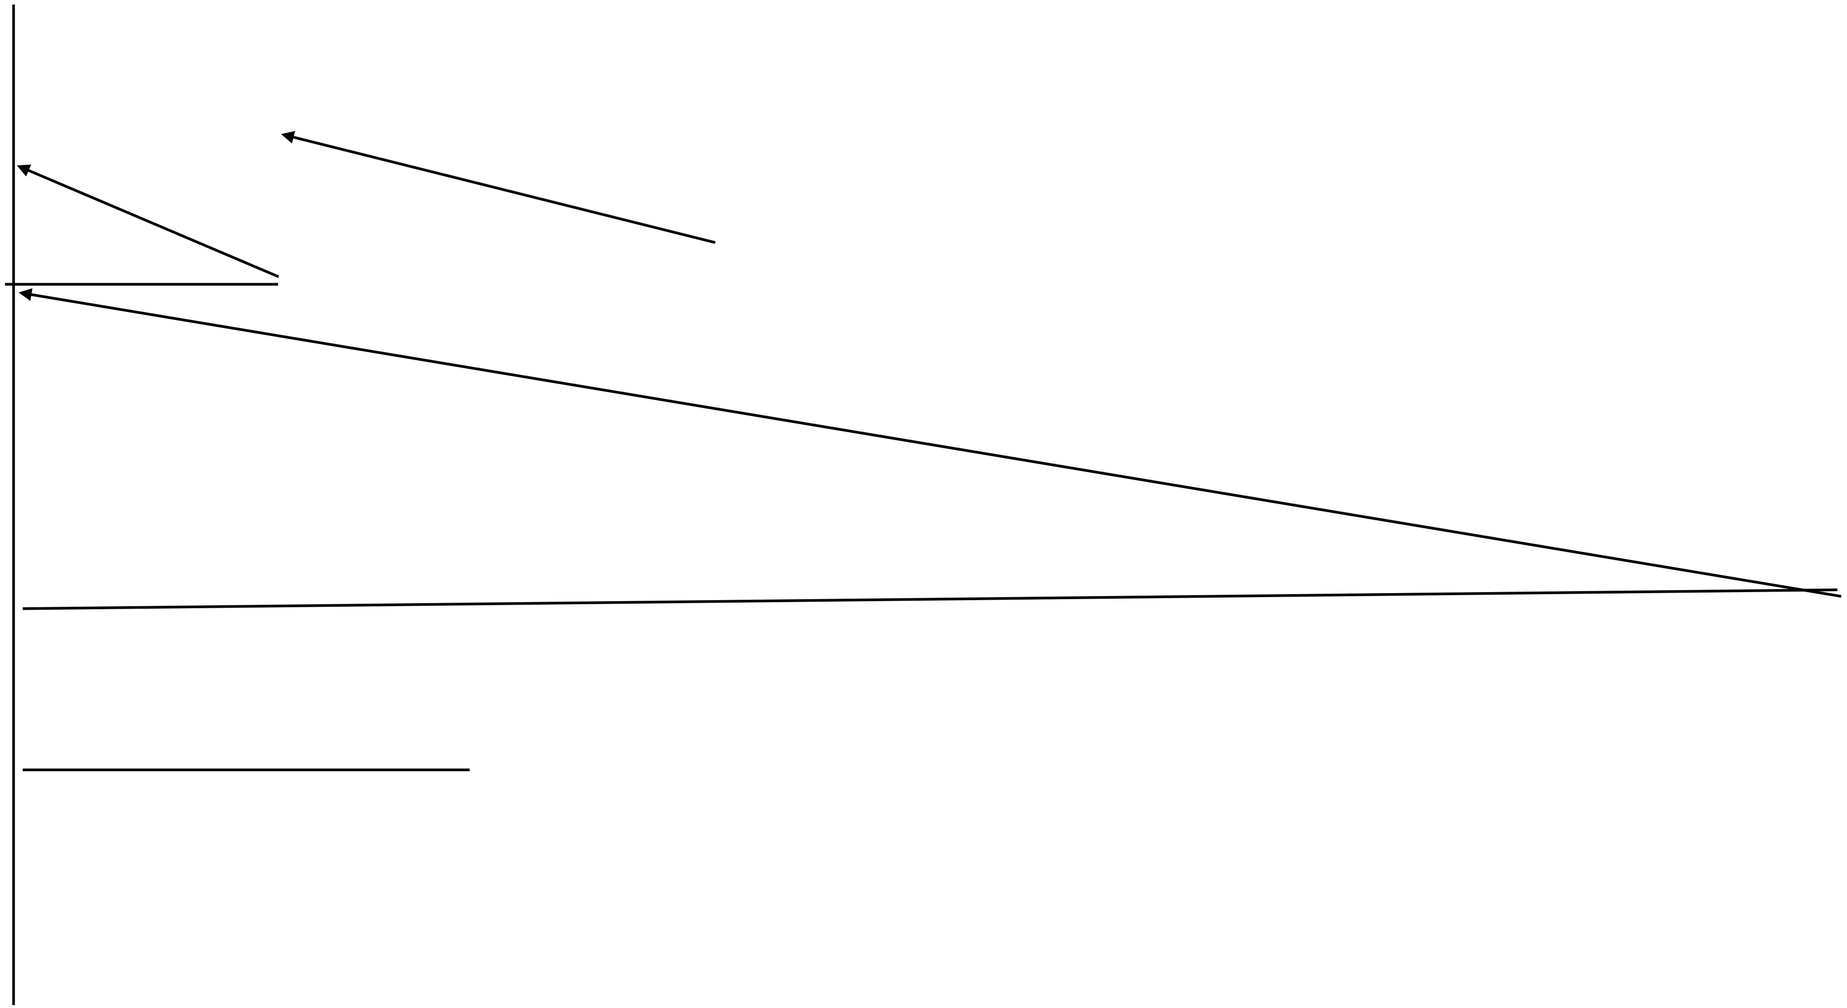

All you have to do is loop enough objections; the right way - this is how you use objections to instil more certainty into the prospect.

Time / Amount of Objections Conquered

I
A

Close (END RESULT)

Opening

I
A

How do we loop the right way?

To loop successfully, all you have to do is create confidence in the prospects mind around 1 of 3 things...

I
A

You, your service or your agency

I
A

You, your service or your agency

I
A

If your prospect raises an objection or doesn’t buy, it’s because they don’t have confidence in one of these 3 things

I
A

If it’s not you, your service or your agency, then the prospect is doubting themselves

I
A

Smokescreen Objections

Simply put; 80% of all objections are merely smokescreens to cover up a lack of confidence, in you, your agency or your service.

I

Most objections are simply a coverup for a lack of confidence

A common mistake agency owners make is to craft a very good rebuttal for a specific objection

I
A

But then they forget that the reason the objection is there is due to a lack of confidence

I
A

So if you aren't overcoming certain objections, just realise that it's actually got nothing to do with the content of the objection itself, more so the layer of doubt the objection is positioned on

I
A

E.g “Let me think about it” doesn’t mean “I need some time to make this decision”

I
A

It means “I’ve got serious doubt in your product and so I’m going to put off buying it”

I
A

Over time you can distinguish between real objections and smokescreen objections

I
A

Action Thresholds

Emotions drive our actions

Everyone has an ‘Action Threshold’

I
A

This is basically a threshold for decision making

It’s the point as which decisiveness appears in the conscious mind

I
A

Some people have high action thresholds, others have low ones

I
A

People with lower action thresholds will make a decision with less information and less certainty

I

People with high action thresholds require lots of information and certainty before deciding

Simply put; how much emotion does someone need to feel before pulling the trigger?

I
A

Let’s define which emotions influence action thresholds so that we can learn how to meet them

I
A

Six emotions

1. Confidence; the higher the confidence, the lower the action threshold

2. Doubt; the higher the doubt, the higher the action threshold

3. Pain; the higher the pain, the lower the action threshold

4. Comfort; the higher the comfort, the higher the action threshold

5. Desire; the higher the desire, the lower the action threshold

6. Fineness; the higher the fineness, the higher the action threshold

I
A

Confidence, pain and desire all drive decisions

I
A

Doubt, comfort and fineness all inhibit decisions

I
A

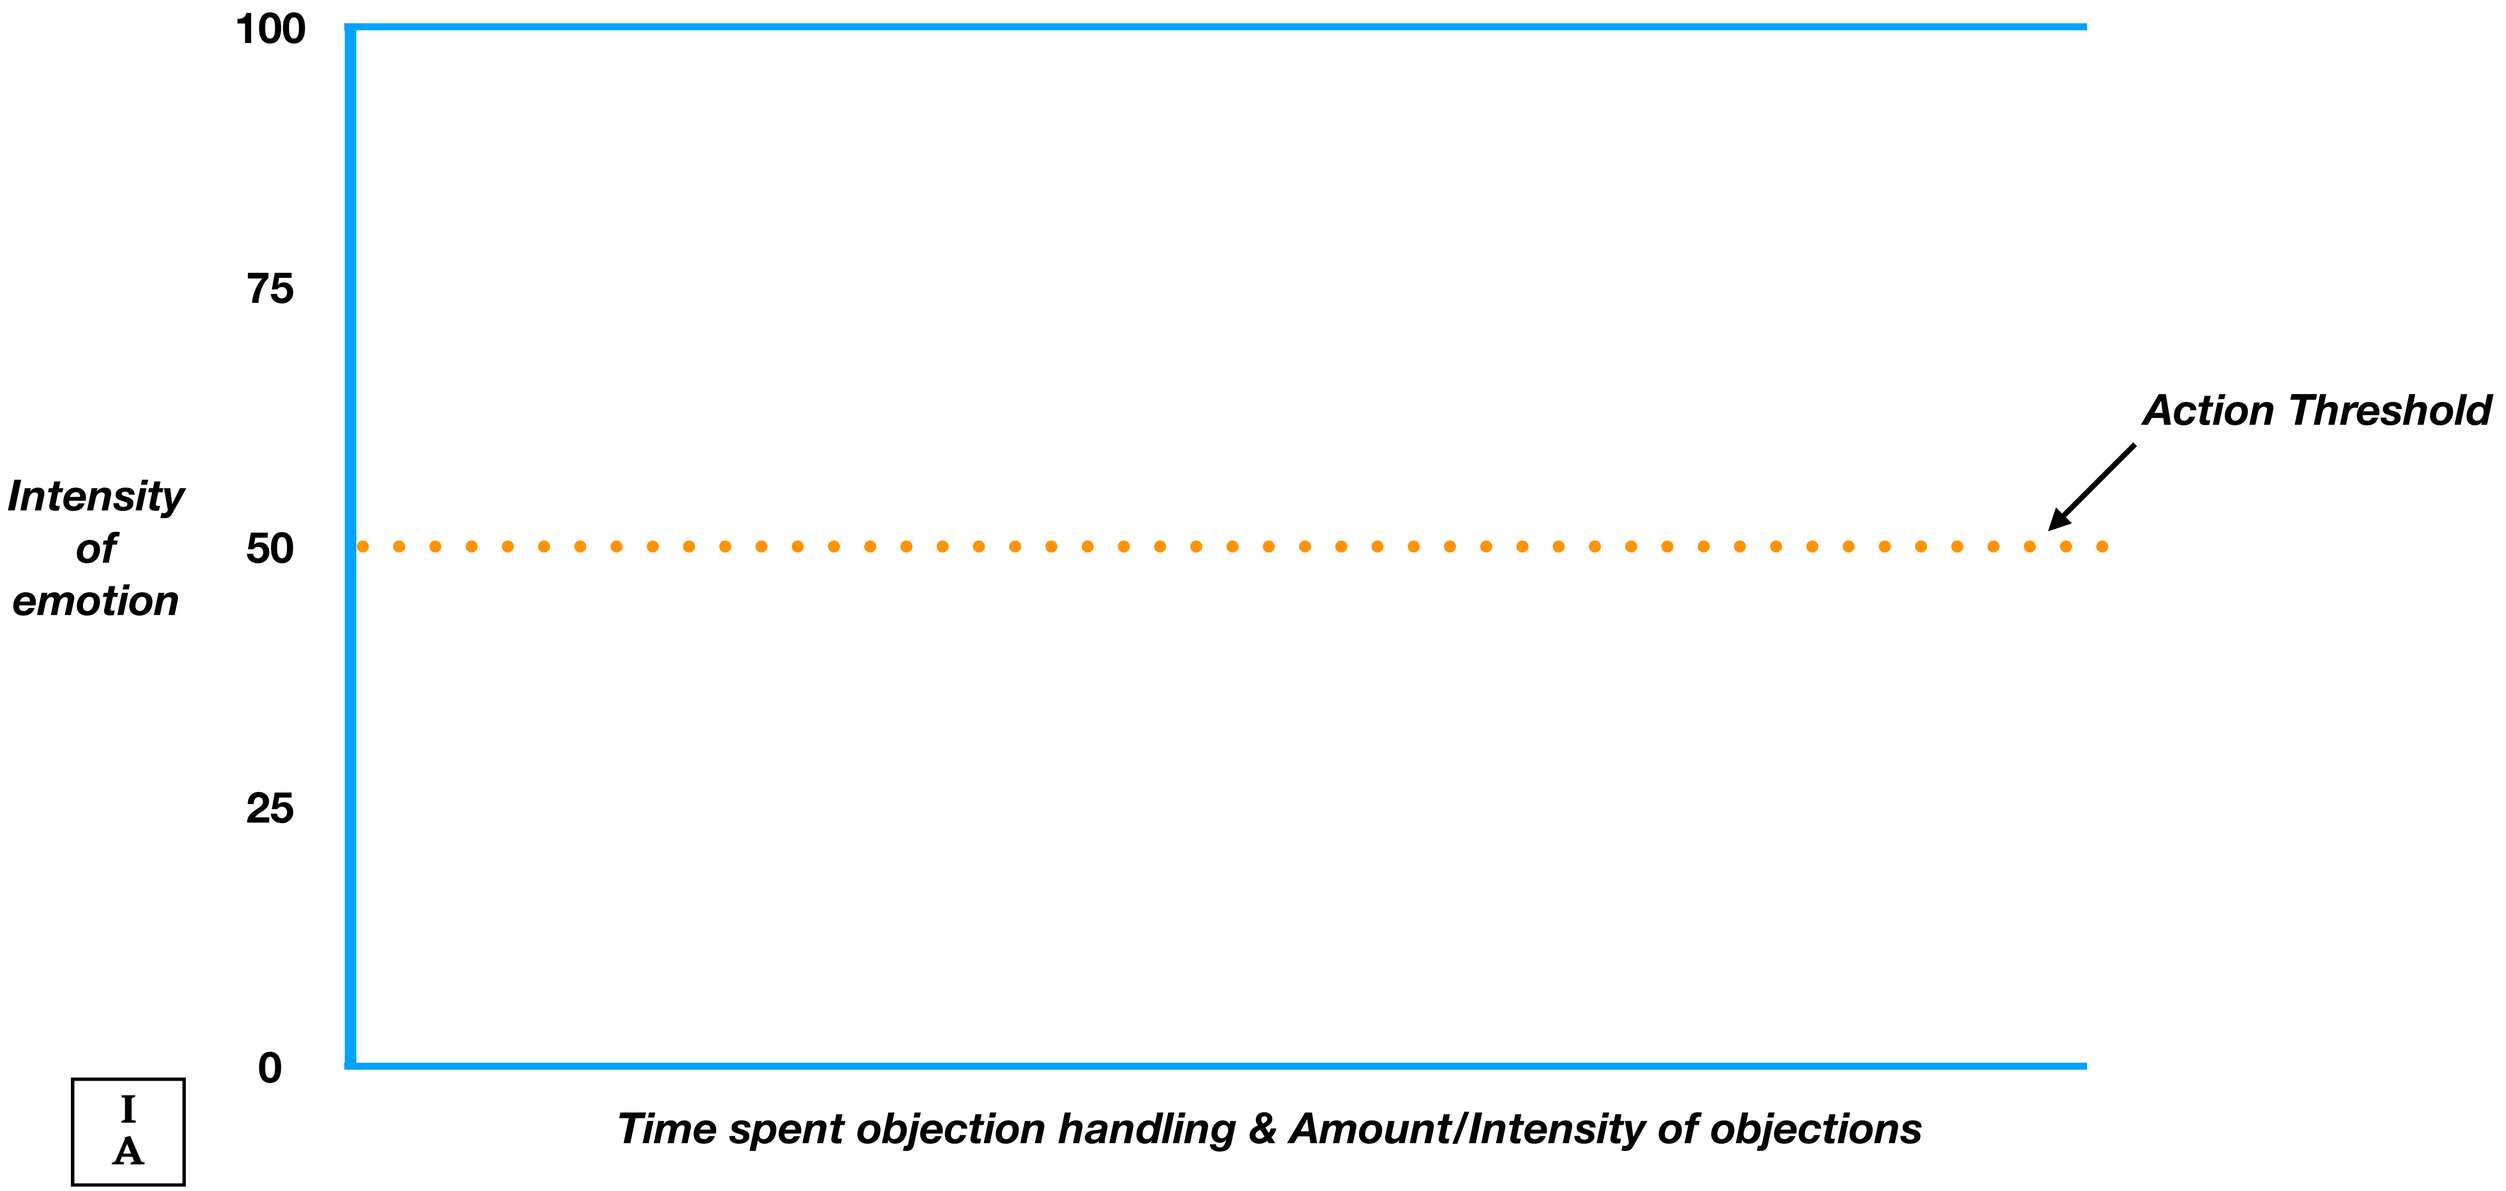

Your mission when conquering objections is to instil the former and eradicate the latter

I

Let’s check out a graph to see how these work

For the sake of this exercise, we're going to call confidence, pain and desire the 'A Team' and doubt, comfort and fineness the 'B Team'...

Preventing The Retreat

Why do people not buy?

Because they ‘retreat to fine’

If you can’t overcome someone’s objection and they don’t buy

I

it’s because they’ve assess their current situation and have decided they are happy with it, or at least happy enough to not try to change

I

When you are handling objections, do not retreat to fine
